is organising an online public discussion on:

New President, Old Problems: The Biden Administration and the Eastern Mediterranean

President-elect Joe Biden prepares to take office amidst radically different predictions of what this will mean for Turkey and its neighbors. Some anticipate a "reset" between Ankara and the West, while others anticipate Washington will now take a much tougher line with Turkey. With tensions still high in the Eastern Mediterranean, many of America's allies in the region are eager to work with the new administration to calm them. Will this be possible? And if so, what will it entail?
